Woodstock History Notes - Two Woodstocks

From the Middle Ages and like the contrade of Siena, the two parts of Woodstock, divided by the Glyme, considered themselves to be separate communities. For 150 years there was even a toll exacted on the citizens of Old Woodstock when entering their newer neighbour until (now) Manor Road was dis-turnpiked in 1878.

Old Woodstock's strong sense of independent identity was – and still is - symbolised by the annual mock-mayor making and a rowdy procession across the river and into and around New Woodstock. This separateness lasted until the sudden influx of newcomers in the 1960s when Old Woodstock's population increased from 264 persons in 1951 to over a thousand in 1989. Living in 250 newly built houses to the east of the relatively few old houses built hard up against Blenheim's estate wall, these newcomers turned to New Woodstock for the services normally expected of any town.

By contrast, in the 14th century there were as few as six buildings in Old Woodstock, including a hospital for lepers which does not seem to have discouraged the Fellows of Balliol College from retreating across the river to Manor Farm to escape pestilence in the city of Oxford.
